The Menninger Clinic is pleased to offer the only Child Attachment Interview Training outside of the Anna Freud Centre, London, UK.

The Child Attachment Interview (CAI) allows professionals to assess the quality of children's attachment relationships with parents or caregivers during middle childhood and adolescence. The COMB-NIP course trains professionals in how to administer and code the CAI.

Who Should Attend

The CAI Training Course is relevant to school psychologists, counselors and teachers; child mental health professionals; and researchers.

The CAI (Shmueli-Goetz et al., 2008; Target et al., 2003) focuses on current attachment memories, rather than retrospective accounts, and elicits children's perceptions of their attachment figures' current availability and sensitive responsiveness. The interview invites children to describe and reflect upon their attachment experiences and relationships—at times of hurt, emotional upset, illness, separation and loss—as a way of gaining access to their internal representations of those relationships. The coding is taught by reviewing videotaped interviews, providing practice in the coding of the CAI, which yields attachment strategies analogous to those identified in infancy and adulthood.

Further Training

Those wishing to receive CAI accreditation are required to complete the additional reliability test, which includes the coding of 30 interviews. Further information about the reliability test will be available during the training course.
